My dearest

Such a morning! The clearest of clear blue skies, long streaks of white cloud across it and all lit up by sun. All the trees bathed in morning sun and sparkling with droplets and the corn field on the other side of the hedge with a golden light. Aren't these mornings after storm wonderful. I don't think we had a great deal of rain yesterday but we had some pretty heavy showers. I was out in two. One was the way back from Guildford and coming back from having tea with Mrs Irvine. Clara enjoyed that very much and laughed to see the droplets patterning down and put her fingers into the water as in collected on the mackintosh that covers the tram. Violet tried to stop her but I took her part. She is getting more attractive every day she is so ready to laugh and have fun. She was laughing yesterday when she was having tea with the Irvines. Miss Irvine his sister's sister is still there and had baby on her lap most of the time. I'm afraid they are still very anxious about this boy. He getting on but very slowly. He takes his food well but does not seem to thrive on it. And Clive does not take all his and is as fat and healthy as possible.

I had a strenuous morning at Guildford yesterday; I cut out all the time. It only means cutting surgical gauze into lengths, but I had to go as hard as I could and keep the workers supplied and that meant standing at it for $2\frac{1}{2}$ hrs. I wasn't tired except my feet felt rather sore upon. We are rather a success over there we are so much quicker than most of the workers. I hope we shall bring them standard up a bit. Of course you can't expect old people to work as fast as we do, still there is such a difference in getting through as much as you can in the time, and in being occupied while you talk, and that is the way many of them do it. Mildred can fold so quickly that she can keep five workers employed sewing, the usual pace might keep two going.

In your last letter dearest, you pictured me last Wednesday afternoon stitching up the now. I hope you noted that I was doing no such thing, but on a long hot journey hunting rooms. My dear that Wednesday for you did not sound nice, taking the new Scotsman round, he triad and you with a headache.

Does the noise of firing make your head ache.

I am glad you should sometimes have such peaceful moments as you had when writing the letter. Lying in the settle at your day out all doasasy with the sun.
Yes I know the feeling all right. I always feel in must be so health giving and restful.

I heard from your mother yesterday on a post card and your Father seems to be much worse than I had understood from her first letter. He has been in bed with quite a lot of pain & is very weak she says, but he was getting up yesterday and going into the garden and they hoped it would make him sleep better. It sounds quite nasty doesn't it?

Violet is going home today but she do will not leave till the 1.20 so I shall be able to go to Guildford this morning

I have had no answer yet about what I do with you & 250.

I have begun reading Boswells life of Johnson and I am finding it interesting. It carries one on does not it. I have just got to where Johnson was given a pair of shoes at Pembroke College & he flung them down stairs because he was too proud to accept them, and then he had to leave the college altogether because he was so poor.

I sent off a parcel yesterday afternoon - chocolate cake, jam, soup tablets and I think butter. I did not pack it myself because I had at very much time yesterday and Mrs Wooster offered to.

We are going to have more rain, some grey clouds are coming up now.

Oh dearest I do want you so badly. I wonder when it will be over. Don't you think the Germans will make other exertions at peace if some went this autumn. I don't suppose we shall accept them but if they start this autumn, they might come to acid down sufficiently by the spring to have peace.

I had a letter from you this morning saying you had gone to rest for four days. I am so glad. I hoped you were there now. I must have answered it till to tomorrow

Your very loving Ruth
