

Sept. 20. 1916

Darling, Another letter from you let us
- so the mails are not doing so badly. It is very nice of you to garden so diligently at the Holt; I suppose the Chase folk will all be back now just starting the new school year - but it seems that it is going to prevent your activities. Yes, I'm afraid too that the poplars will have to be lopped. I'm very glad the acacia has done so well after the amputation of last year. I wish the Wychesiana roses would do really well, & I want the creepers under the loggia to grow. I think you said one jessamine was alive there. It would be good thing to get something growing up the props below the landslipping bank. This talk makes me almost homesick.

I've had another quiet day in the map-room - the Captain has been away most of the day & I have been in charge.
Much firing still goes on, of which I'm glad - it looks like business; but we're p.s. By a new arrangement it seems likely that O.P. duty will only be about one day in ten! That's good news isn't it?

had more rain intermittently & the ground must still be very heavy where it has been recently cut up by shell fire; it ought to make a lot of difference that our men will have quite a considerable slope in their favour. I shan't be in the trenches either to-morrow or the next day.

Austin Earl came to dinner last night. I was glad to see him. But I'm afraid he's not enjoying life. I wouldn't expect it of him; I found myself listening to a good deal of talk about an offensive subaltern in his battery whom he evidently dislikes very much; he lets little things get on his nerves & that's a great pity. He is with G.2 now & thank God I'm not; his battery seems to be spending all its moments wrestling with their gigantic shells in a sea of mud; they have almost nothing in the way of dug-outs yet & they have endless trouble under these conditions in laying platforms & bringing the guns into action. Earl was evidently enormously impressed by our comparative comfort; and indeed we really are very comfortable here. It will be leastly clearing out. The charm of Austin is greatly in his frankness; & then he's a high-souled creature & has a real vein of nobility; I'm sure he'll do anything to help a friend & would hate to act meanly more than almost anybody. I don't expect ever to get much out of him intellectually; he is unspeculative & I almost feel that his spiritual activities such as they are are only a part of being an educated gentleman — Rather an XVIIIth Century type — a bit of the fine aristocrat. What different sorts one likes. I was glad to hear that he made up his quarrel with Leveson — he's a person I want to see again too. It also told me of the military career of one we called 'Bob' — the very confident little Scot — you must have heard us talk of him; — he was disturbed during the performance of his duty at the latrine by the whistle of an 'Archie' case (reckoned very harmless though of course it wouldn't be to be hit by one) which so frightened him that he attempted precipitate
